What is Brown Adipose Tissue?

You have already known that brown fat levels are the main factors behind unnecessary fat accumulation. Several clinical studies and research have demonstrated that obese individuals tend to have lower brown fat levels, and losing weight becomes quite challenging for them in that scenario.

Low brown adipose tissue count also impacts the fat-dissolving rate of the human body. Now, what is brown adipose tissue (BAT)? Well, brown adipose tissue or brown fat cells are particular fat cells that differ from white fat cells.

According to scientists, the primary function of brown fat is to regulate the body temperature of the human body in challenging temperature conditions. Usually, brown fat gets generated when you remain in cold weather, and it regulates your body temperature at that point.

Brown fat burns more calories than usual white fat, and that's why brown adipose tissue (BAT) levels matter so much for people who want to lose weight. The cells of brown adipose tissue contain more mitochondria. If you're savvy about the human anatomy, you must know that mitochondria are the powerhouses of the body that convert foods into energy.

An elevation in the levels of brown adipose tissue means that you start burning more calories to retain your body temperature during a cold condition. As you burn more calories than usual, you get slimmer over time by shedding a serious amount of weight.

When the levels of brown adipose tissue are insufficient in your body, you don't burn adequate calories to retain a trimmed physique. That's why elevating brown adipose tissue levels is the only way out for obese people to get rid of their excess fat.
