Understanding Neuropathy

Neuropathy, often called peripheral neuropathy, is a condition resulting from damage to the peripheral nerves, which are responsible for relaying information between the brain, spinal cord, and the rest of the body. It commonly causes sensations like tingling, numbness, burning, and pain, especially in the hands and feet. Neuropathy can result from various causes, including diabetes, injury, infections, vitamin deficiencies, and exposure to toxins. While there's no single cure, effective management often involves addressing the underlying cause, dietary supplements, physical therapy, and medication to reduce symptoms. Vitamins, especially B vitamins, and antioxidant-rich supplements like alpha-lipoic acid may help support nerve repair and reduce symptoms. Understanding neuropathy’s cause and working with healthcare providers are essential steps to managing its effects and improving quality of life.
